Building Bonds

Creating connection with your child through communication

Setting up a foundation for open and regular communication is essential to your child's social-emotional development. Conversation at every age creates the opportunity to foster kindness and confidence, and it builds the adult-child relationship, says Rebecca Rolland, a mother, speech pathologist and Harvard University lecturer.

It's not actually the content of the conversation that matters most. Rather than trying to get conversation right, it's much more important that we're responsive to kids and following their lead.

The ABCs of talk

To start building a foundation for communication, Rolland suggests using the ABCs of rich conversation. They are:

Adult-framed. Look for the times when your child is most open to opening up. It might be before bed or while playing with their toys. Work time into your schedule around these moments to talk with them when they're ready.

Back-and-forth. Instead of lecturing your child, allow space for them to respond. The more back-and-forth in a conversation, the better for their overall development.

Child-driven. Let children take the lead when talking. Adults should be conversation partners instead of driving the talk.

Tips for talk

There are a lot of suggestions on what to say to your child, but Rolland says "ditch the scripts" and try instead to be responsive to what they're saying. This allows conversations to be based on the child's interests.

When children bring up their interests, even if you don't share those, it's so powerful to ask open-ended questions. This helps children feel they have something to teach you, as opposed to always being on the answering side.

Ask questions that invite conversation - for example: “How did that make you feel?” or “What happened next?” instead of yes/no questions. If they don’t know or don’t want to talk, adults can model answering these types of questions by telling their own stories. You can set a silent phone alarm for at least five minutes and engage with your child, listen and reflect what you hear during this time.

Emotional regulation

Sometimes it’s hard to have a conversation because dysregulated emotions, either yours or your child’s, make it complicated. When you feel an intense emotional response to something, it can be difficult to respond appropriately and can lead to impulsive behavior. Emotions like anger are oftentimes difficult to manage.

When you are dysregulated or when you flip your lid, it is impossible for you to have a conversation with your child that is meaningful or that is going to be productive. Once you’re not reacting emotionally, the conversation can flow. Here are tips to build a trusting relationship through conversation:

- Keep calm. When your child is acting out and yelling, try approaching the situation by maintaining a calm and neutral tone of voice.
- Apologize. No one is perfect. Apologizing is about owning your part and acknowledging that you made a mistake.
- Set consequences. Instead of giving a punishment, it’s better to explain repercussions of actions. Do this when you’re calm. Or, ask your child what they think is an appropriate consequence for their action. You might be surprised by what they say.

Creating lasting bonds with your child through conversation may take time and work, but with some effort, you are laying the groundwork for a lifetime of connection and trust.

Flip your lid

Flipping your lid is a term used to describe emotional dysregulation. When you or your child is yelling, the emotional brain is in charge, and neither one of you is in a space to have a logical conversation. Noticing when your child’s emotions (or yours) are approaching dysregulation is key to intervening and remaining calm. Give yourselves a moment by pausing, so you can respond thoughtfully.

Open-ended questions

It’s important to ask kids questions that result in stories, rather than “yes” or “no”. Examples:

- Who made you smile today?
- What mistake did you make today?
- Who did you sit with at lunch today?
- Did anything happen today that was unexpected?
- How did you challenge yourself today?
- If your toys could talk, what would they say?
- Why is that interesting to you? What’s cool about it?
- Can you tell me more about that?
- Was there any drama today?

PARC in the Community

PARC continues to hold the Macomb and Southfield parent supports group on a monthly basis. For the summer months, PARC moved the Southfield support group to the park so we could enjoy pizza together and soak up some of the warm weather!

In July, several families gathered at Jimmy John's Field for an evening filled with baseball, food, and fireworks. Before the game began, some of the families had the honor of carrying out the flag for the national anthem. After the final inning, the children enjoyed the chance to run the bases. We finished the night with an amazing fireworks show!

In August, Tanille Hill joined us to lead a training on special education. Tanille provided families with valuable insight into IEPs and how to navigate them, helping build confidence and clarity around the process. The training's goal was to empower families to better advocate for their children within the special education system.

PARC has several things in the works for the upcoming months, be sure to keep an eye out. As always, if you have any ideas or suggestions, please feel free to reach out!
